Key Issues

Integrating health and social care has been an objective of national policy for more than three decades but has started to gather pace with the introduction of the Health and Care Bill, which is expected to put integrated care systems (ICSs) on a statutory footing from April 2022 (now postponed to July 2022). ICSs are intended to promote equal partnership between the NHS and its wider partners, including local authorities and social care. Within social care, there is a concern among providers that they will be left 'outside the tent.' Statutory ICSs will comprise two key bodies – an Integrated Care Board (ICB) and an Integrated Care Partnership (ICP).

ICBs will take on the NHS planning functions previously held by clinical commissioning groups. Each ICB will produce a five-year plan for how NHS services will be delivered to meet local needs. This wider strategy will be developed by the second key body – the ICP. ICPs are statutory committees bringing together the NHS, local authorities, and other organisations, including those from social care, as equal partners to focus more widely on health, public health, and social care.

Key messages for adult social care and its partners include:

- ICSs are an opportunity to develop genuinely joined-up, personalised care.
- There is a need for clarity about structures and systems.
- ICS leadership and culture are critical.
